Business in the Arab World

In the aftermath of the Arab Spring, how have the economies of the region responded to political developments? Have businesses there been affected by a sense of upheaval and change? What steps are being taken to modernise Middle Eastern and North African economies? And if jobs are being created, are they robust enough to stand the test of time?

Economic progress could enhance political stability in the Arab world. After all, the mass protests that took place were an expression not only of dismay at political conditions but also of frustration at persistent economic misery.

We report on small and medium-sized businesses, large-scale projects undertaken with the help of foreign experts, as well as education and training programs.
