The construction of the Ilisu Dam in Turkey flooded priceless cultural monuments. These included the city of Hasankeyf, in the south-east of the country. The last inhabitants had to watch as their centuries-old culture disappeared.

In south-eastern Turkey, the last inhabitants of Hasankeyf are watching their home disappear into the waters of the Tigris. For Turkish President Erdoğan, the construction of the Ilisu Dam is a prestige project. Its goal is to bring modernization. But it is also an expression of the president's political power. Hundreds of villages in the predominantly Kurdish region were flooded by the reservoir. In 2020, the small town of Hasankeyf, with its iconic cave dwellings and unique cultural history, was also flooded. Archaeological treasures that bear witness to 12,000 years of settlement history in the region in Anatolia are probably lost forever.

The inhabitants of Hasankeyf have been forcibly resettled. Instead of living in their traditional houses, they now live in purpose-built developments - soulless houses made of concrete. Shepherd Rengin was forced to give up her flock: Animal husbandry is not allowed in her new home. Burak the barber is also finding it difficult to cope with his new everyday life. Along with their ancestral homes, the people of Hasankeyf have also lost their parts of their community -- and identity.

What do young Chinese people dream of? What hopes and goals do they have? Do the grandchildren of the "rising generation" still believe in progress through work, and prosperity for all? Or do they have different values?

In China, people rarely talk about their own dreams. There is the government's "Chinese Dream," of course: It promises prosperity to those who work hard and propel their country forward to the top of the world. But the boom is over, and China's economy is stagnating. Many young people can't find jobs. Many also no longer want to work as hard as their parents did.

In two episodes "A Day with Paintboxers, Influencers, and Millionaires" and "A Night with Rock Stars, Rebels, and Princesses," the filmmakers meet young people who are breaking with their parents' hopes and dreams. The subjects let the filmmakers into their homes, and open their hearts. The filmmakers, in turn, don't talk about the young people — instead, they let them tell their own stories.

"Our generation's dreams are completely different," says a young woman. "My dream shouldn't be built on my children, but on myself." "I feel like I can try anything and achieve anything I set my mind to," believes another. "I don't have big ambitions," admits a young man. "I just want to have enough money to live on so I can do what I enjoy." And yet another emphasizes: "I don't want to become a workhorse, but an interesting soul."

01:15 DocFilm*Peru - Life at 4,000 Meters

The Peruvian Altiplano is one of the most extreme habitats in the world. Located over 4,000 meters above sea level, the region attracts millions of visitors - and pushes many of them to their physical limits.

But for tens of thousands of people, the highlands are everyday life.

Around La Rinconada, the highest city in the world at 5,300 meters, residents brave freezing temperatures and thin air. Their motivation: a massive gold deposit. Every day, some 10,000 miners, like Arnaldo, venture into life-threatening shafts — often for a wage that barely covers their basic needs. Meanwhile, a small police unit led by Major Aranda fights against lawlessness and the illegal trade in explosives.

Another treasure of the Altiplano is the precious vicuña wool, one of the most expensive in the world. The shy animals that produce it live in the wild and may be sheared only once a year during the traditional "Chakku" hunt — a ritual that unites community, culture, and a connection to nature.

The documentary takes viewers on an impressive journey to the heights of the Andes — and meets with people who live and work under extreme conditions while preserving their traditions. A glimpse into a world that's both harsh — and breathtakingly beautiful.

01:15 DocFilm*Octopus Under Threat - Searching for Clues Around the Mediterranean

Octopus is considered a delicacy - grilled, boiled, or fried. But rising demand has consequences, and in several regions of Europe, this intelligent cephalopod is already considered overfished.

Stocks are shrinking dramatically, especially in the Mediterranean. In Greece, illegal traps are often used for fishing. Together with the coast guard, the environmental organization Sea Shepherd has removed thousands of these traps from the seabed - part of a mission against environmental crime.

The film crew embarks on an investigative journey along the coasts of Europe and Africa. In Galicia, northwestern Spain, there are several large fish processing plants that cut up octopuses, freeze them, and prepare them for the international market. Fishing is subject to strict regulations because natural stocks are shrinking rapidly. To meet the high demand, factories are increasingly resorting to imports from African waters.

A corporation is planning to breed octopuses in aquaculture. However, the plan has been met with fierce criticism from environmentalists, and the project has been put on hold for the time being.

The breeding of octopuses is ethically and ecologically questionable: the animals are highly intelligent and sensitive, suffer from stress in captivity, and no humane slaughter methods exist. In addition, their meat-based diet puts strain on marine ecosystems, and thus goes against sustainable aquaculture.

In the Mediterranean, the common octopus (octopus vulgaris) is caught in many places. In Greece, for example, long ropes of plastic traps attached to buoys are placed on the seabed. A local fisherman shows the camera team how the yield is steadily declining - a direct consequence of overfishing.

The ecological consequences of octopus overfishing are already visible: in Italy, the invasive blue crab is spreading uncontrollably. It is one of the octopus's favorite foods - but without natural enemies, it is now destroying mussel farming in the Po Delta and thus posing a threat to livelihoods.

Could the return of octopuses be the solution? An organization from Austria is testing exactly that, off the Croatian island of Krk. There, researchers are investigating whether octopuses can settle in artificial caves, reproduce, and contribute to the long-term stabilization of the ecosystem. The experiments are still in their infancy, but hopes are high: a sustainable model for the entire Mediterranean region could emerge.

10:30 DocFilm*Where Everything Disappears

A video diary from the frontline trenches: Ukrainian commander and cameraman Dmytro Dokunov can't save his comrades. Can he free himself from the horror of the Russian attack on Ukraine?

Dmytro Dokunov, known as Dok, is a tall, peace-loving man, fighting on the frontline against Russian invaders. His mobile phone camera is always on. Everyone in his unit is wracked by fear. There's nothing heroic about this war. Dok is a pacifist. A vegetarian. He spent the last year before the war in a remote Ukrainian village, building an eco-community, meditating, gardening, and making art. A notice from the military office presented him with a dilemma: to join the army, and face a difficult moral choice, or to run away from mobilization. He decided to accept the challenge and fight for his homeland...

Dok ended up in the army's most dangerous unit — the paratrooper reconnaissance unit. He spent four months at the paratroopers' training camp, learning to cross rivers, fire a machine gun, and jump from a helicopter. He first saw the war up-close on the frontline near Kherson. In the first battle, some of his comrades were ambushed and killed. Dok's closest battle buddy, a Krishna devotee nicknamed 'Thor,' also died.

A few days later, Dok led his men into the next battle. Referred to in radio communications as "Position Zero", this battle took place directly alongside the enemy. Explosions, nights in the trenches, dozens of wounded, corpses to be evacuated, the loss of friends. All taking place amidst the beauty of nature. Between lakes full of cranes and endless fields of sunflowers, Dok's diary shows how the reality of war hits like a punch in the face.

Fishermen vs. Seals

Decades ago, gray seals in the Baltic Sea were considered virtually extinct, mercilessly hunted by humans. Thanks to a hunting ban, the population recovered. Now, they're making life difficult for fishermen.

Decades ago, humans had nearly wiped out gray seals. But now, the animals are making life difficult for fishermen in the Baltic Sea. One of Latvia's last fishermen is responding with bite-resistant nets. In Sweden, hunting the animals is permitted again. The gray seal is Germany's largest predator. And although seals are still rarely seen on the German Baltic coast, they're causing conflicts here too.

The Baltic Sea is now home to around 55,000 of these animals. An adult gray seal eats about ten kilograms of fish a day.

Janis Kruminis is one of the last fishermen on the Latvian Baltic coast. He has adapted his craft to the animals. With bite-resistant nets and homemade traps resembling fish traps, he tries to defy the predators.

To protect the fishermen, the Swedish government has lowered the animals' protection status and has even permitted the hunting of a limited number of gray seals again. The quota has not been fully utilized — so far. Shooting the animals in wind and waves is difficult. Furthermore, selling the catch is not permitted.

Scientist Peter Ljungberg supports the hunting of these marine mammals, which can weigh up to 200 kilograms. The estimated 400 animals now living on Germany's Baltic Sea coast still constitute an insignificant number. Nevertheless, fishermen are suspected of having deliberately lured more than 40 of the protected animals into traps or nets last fall to drown them. The seals washed up dead on the coast of Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania. Marine biologist Judith Denking from the German Oceanographic Museum in Stralsund has dissected the carcasses. The animals do indeed appear to have drowned. The return of gray seals to Germany's Baltic Sea coast has become something of a murder mystery.

In the Belly of AI

Magical, autonomous, all-powerful: Artificial intelligence fuels our dreams and nightmares. While tech companies promise us a better future, AI is already causing serious harm.

Huge data centers and server farms are required for AI programs to function. These are paving over landscapes and consuming immense amounts of water and electricity — mostly from fossil fuels, and thus dirty energy sources. Millions of low-wage workers worldwide are busy feeding data to, and training, the algorithms for AI programs — often at the expense of their mental and emotional health. These workers, many of them young and living in the Global South, are exposed to all manner of harmful content to train AI models to detect such material.

What do young Chinese people dream of? What hopes and goals do they have? Do the grandchildren of the "rising generation" still believe in progress through work, and prosperity for all? Or do they have different values? In China, people rarely talk about their own dreams. There is the government's "Chinese Dream," of course: It promises prosperity to those who work hard and propel their country forward to the top of the world. But the boom is over, and China's economy is stagnating. Many young people can't find jobs. Many also no longer want to work as hard as their parents did. In two episodes "A Day with Paintboxers, Influencers, and Millionaires" and "A Night with Rock Stars, Rebels, and Princesses," the filmmakers meet young people who are breaking with their parents' hopes and dreams. The subjects let the filmmakers into their homes, and open their hearts. The filmmakers, in turn, don't talk about the young people — instead, they let them tell their own stories.

"Our generation's dreams are completely different," says a young woman. "My dream shouldn't be built on my children, but on myself." "I feel like I can try anything and achieve anything I set my mind to," believes another. "I don't have big ambitions," admits a young man. "I just want to have enough money to live on so I can do what I enjoy." And yet another emphasizes: "I don't want to become a workhorse, but an interesting soul."

These are the stories of women giving birth at the hospital in Bethlehem. The Holy Family Hospital is a place of hope, in a region marked by conflict, violence and insecurity.

The film offers an intimate glimpse into the daily lives of the doctors, midwives and nurses who fight with unwavering dedication for the health of mothers and newborns. Bethlehem, the biblical birthplace of Jesus, lies at the heart of a region that has been a battleground for decades. This makes the work of the hospital run by the Order of Malta all the more significant: Since 1990, more than 100,000 children have been born there. The facility provides medical care of the highest standard - regardless of the expectant mothers' origin, religion or social status. A mobile medical team also travels to remote villages around Bethlehem, often under difficult conditions, passing through checkpoints and roadblocks.

The documentary follows expectant mothers and the dedicated staff. One of them is gynecologist Dana Amro. "We open our doors to all pregnant women - regardless of gender, religion or skin color. We turn away no one who asks us for help," she says. Amro often has to set off for work extremely early, in order to allow for any potential delays on the way.

Senior midwife Lorette Farah Khalil Al-Allam has been working at Holy Family Hospital for 27 years and has attended thousands of births. Among the mothers featured is Khuloud Obayat, who lost her husband shortly before the birth of her son Omar and is raising her children in difficult circumstances.

Despite all the tensions in the region, the maternity hospital sends out a powerful message of humanity, solidarity and active compassion. Whilst in many places people are asking how peace can be possible, this place provides a clear answer - with an open door, and open hearts.

01:15 DocFilm*My Child Is Trans* - What Now?

The psychological distress experienced by children and adolescents who feel they have been born as the wrong gender is immense. It can even lead to suicide. But is gender reassignment at a young age the right decision?

"Whatever created my body simply made a mistake in the production process," explains Kira. The 17-year-old was born a boy. Five years ago, she came out to her parents: "I'm a girl." After the initial shock, Kira's parents wondered how they could help their child—because puberty was just around the corner, with facial hair growth and a changing voice. "We asked ourselves: But what if it's just a phase?" recalls Kira's mother. Should they agree to medical interventions—or wait and see and do nothing? Both can cause harm. A dilemma.

Interventions involving hormone treatments and gender-affirming surgeries have side effects. That's why children and parents should be certain that the trans identity is permanent before starting therapy. After all, there are also phases of adolescence in which children and teens experiment with gender roles—without being trans. How can you tell the difference? And what's best for your own child?

This documentary explores the search for answers. Filmmaker Renate Werner accompanies three families as they navigate these difficult decisions. She approaches the adolescents with sensitivity and helps make their motivations understandable. She speaks with experts about the still-emerging field of trans research and what science currently knows about trans identity.

Greenland - The Icy El Dorado

Ever since Donald Trump started talking about acquiring Greenland, the country has become the focus of global attention. This documentary explores the island's history and examines its strategic importance in the 21st century. Greenland has long been more than just a barometer of climate change. But since Donald Trump's return to the White House, the world's largest island - autonomous, yet part of Denmark -- has become a point of contention among the major powers.

Why? As the ice sheets melt, the Arctic Ocean is opening up to shipping and resource extraction. Greenland is thus becoming a key strategic region between North America, Europe and Russia. Its vast mineral resources - ranging from oil and gas to gold and rare earths, which are indispensable for the energy transition and the defense industry - are turning the island into a new El Dorado. Mining companies and world powers alike are competing for a share.

Since Donald Trump's re-election, the debate has become increasingly heated. In 2019, the US President publicly suggested that Greenland could be purchased by the US and accused Denmark of failing to protect the island adequately against global threats. But what lies behind these demands? How is Europe responding to American power politics? And what role can Greenland itself play in this geopolitical power struggle - caught between economic opportunities, environmental risks and the desire for sovereignty?

The documentary blends historical context with contemporary analysis: it shows why Greenland plays a key role in the global order today, what interests are at stake, and how the people of the island wish to shape their future.

Only about 650 people live year-round in the Onsernone Valley in Switzerland. Surrounded by picturesque but rugged nature, life here is not easy for the inhabitants. And one of the top priorities is ensuring the availability of medical care.

The road through the valley winds its way for 28 kilometers through narrow hairpin bends. Much of the area can only be reached on foot, and with considerable physical effort. There is no supermarket.

Above all, medical care must be guaranteed so that the valley remains attractive — for older people, but also for young families.

Josef "Beppe" Savary-Borioli, 72 years old and the valley's long-time doctor, faces the difficult task of finding a successor. He develops a "doctor sharing" model, in which several doctors could share the care of the villagers. For a few months, the experienced mountain doctor is accompanied by young assistant from Locarno — will he be his successor?

There are young families looking for a slower pace of life who are happy to take on the challenges. But living space is scarce, as most of the approximately 1,200 houses in the valley are only used by their owners as vacation homes for a few weeks a year. Mike Keller, who was born in the valley, has returned with a mission: to find new families for the empty vacation homes.

Shaman Daniela Huber has moved to Berzona with her four-year-old son Atticus and his father Adrian to live in her grandmother's house. She spent her summers here as a child. Berzona is one of the most beautiful villages in the Onsernone Valley, but outside the summer season Daniela feels lonely there. Together with Mike, she's now trying to encourage like-minded individuals to follow her example, in a bid to revive the village.

In 2014, the first flood caught the sleeping residents of the Javanese village off guard. Since then, rising sea tides have kept engulfing the village. The water is still rising — up to 15 centimeters in a year.

So far, the residents of the village of Timbulsloko in North Java have been able to keep pace with the rising sea levels by building their homes on higher ground. How long can that go on for? Where once roads and vast rice fields stood, there's now nothing but water. The ocean has carved deep into the land, washing away everything in its path: Homes, gardens, mangrove forests. For generations, people here lived mainly from rice farming. Now they fish, and are experimenting with aquaculture. At high tide, the water in some homes comes up to your knees. The villagers have moved their beds and built walkways to make it possible for them to stay. The ocean is even claiming the cemetery as it moves in on the isolated village, eroding it piece by piece. Residents here are struggling to contain the impacts. How long can they stop the water from disrupting their day-to-day living? At which point will they be forced to leave?

Venice is a city with a character all its own; so unsurprisingly, its cemetery is also unique. Located halfway between the city of Venice and the glassblowing island of Murano, Venetians find their final resting place on the cemetery island of San Michele.

Since the early 19th century, not only native Venetians have been buried here, but also famous visitors such as Ezra Pound, Luigi Nono, Sergei Diaghilev, Igor Stravinsky, Joseph Brodsky, and Emilio Vedova. They have their graves there, in the city they loved.

But the island is not just a place of death and silence. Every day, people come here to look after the cemetery. And it also welcomes regular guests, including members of the association "La laguna nel bicchiere," or "The Lagoon in a Glass." They aim to revive forgotten vineyards in Venice and on its islands. One of these is located in the novitiate garden of the former Camaldolese monastery on San Michele.

These are the stories of women giving birth at the hospital in Bethlehem. The Holy Family Hospital is a place of hope, in a region marked by conflict, violence and insecurity.

The film offers an intimate glimpse into the daily lives of the doctors, midwives and nurses who fight with unwavering dedication for the health of mothers and newborns. Bethlehem, the biblical birthplace of Jesus, lies at the heart of a region that has been a battleground for decades. This makes the work of the hospital run by the Order of Malta all the more significant: Since 1990, more than 100,000 children have been born there. The facility provides medical care of the highest standard - regardless of the expectant mothers' origin, religion or social status. A mobile medical team also travels to remote villages around Bethlehem, often under difficult conditions, passing through checkpoints and roadblocks.

The documentary follows expectant mothers and the dedicated staff. One of them is gynecologist Dana Amro. "We open our doors to all pregnant women - regardless of gender, religion or skin color. We turn away no one who asks us for help," she says. Amro often has to set off for work extremely early, in order to allow for any potential delays on the way.

Senior midwife Lorette Farah Khalil Al-Allam has been working at Holy Family Hospital for 27 years and has attended thousands of births. Among the mothers featured is Khuloud Obayat, who lost her husband shortly before the birth of her son Omar and is raising her children in difficult circumstances.

Despite all the tensions in the region, the maternity hospital sends out a powerful message of humanity, solidarity and active compassion. Whilst in many places people are asking how peace can be possible, this place provides a clear answer - with an open door, and open hearts.

On 22 June 1941, the German Wehrmacht launched a war of aggression against the Soviet Union. Under the code name 'Operation Barbarossa', the campaign aimed to bring the vast country in the east to its knees. Millions of people died as a result.

At the beginning of the Second World War, the Nazi regime celebrated a series of military successes: boosted by rapid victories in Norway, the Netherlands, Belgium and France, the Wehrmacht prepared a secret maneuver in the east, firmly convinced that troops would be back home after a few months. But the period of unimaginable violence unleashed by Hitler would claim millions of lives.

Without declaring war and with more than three million soldiers battle-ready, the Wehrmacht attacked on a broad front between the Baltic Sea and the Black Sea. In the first hours of the meticulously prepared military invasion, the Luftwaffe rained bombs on Soviet bases near the border, catching the Soviets completely off-guard.

The force of the attack was seen as a continuation of the German troops' successful 'Blitzkrieg' campaigns. In his instructions to the Chief of Operations in the Armed Forces High Command, written in March 1941, Hitler had already stated: 'This upcoming campaign is more than just a battle of arms, it's also a clash between two worldviews. The Jewish-Bolshevik intelligentsia, as the previous oppressor of the people, must be eliminated.'

Another aim: the economic exploitation of conquered territories. Many of those involved and affected by this tragedy - Germans and Soviets, soldiers and civilians alike - recorded their harrowing experiences in amateur films, letters and diaries. These vivid descriptions of the German war of aggression in the East are a far cry from official war reporting and state propaganda. These accounts, by men and women fighting for survival, document the horror on both sides of the conflict.

Under the Open Sky

This film tells the story of Ahmed and his family, camel herders in the deserts of western India. For generations, they've roamed the barren land with their animals, leading lives shaped by tradition and nature.

But this way of life is coming under increasing pressure: industrialization, climate change and economic challenges are rapidly transforming the region and threatening the future of nomadic life.

The film follows the family over an extended period, offering a rare insight into their daily lives. With great intimacy, it shows how they search for water sources, tend to their animals and travel through the desolate landscapes. In quiet conversations by the fire or whilst on the move, it becomes clear just how much Ahmed and his family are caught between the past and the future. They wrestle with the question of whether to continue along the old paths or to provide their children with a different, supposedly safer life.

The documentary relies on the simple power of observation. The calm, atmospheric images create an intimate connection with the protagonists, and underline what's at stake: not just a way of life, but an understanding of how to live in harmony with nature. Relationships between people, animals and the landscape merge, in a delicate fabric - all part of a cultural heritage that may soon disappear.

The film is much more than a portrait; it exemplifies how traditional communities worldwide can be torn apart by the tensions of an accelerating present. At the same time, it invites the audience to appreciate the beauty and significance of a way of life that, despite all challenges, retains a remarkable dignity.

Rügen is one of Germany's most popular travel destinations, and one of its most sensitive natural areas. As millions of visitors flock to the beaches and chalk cliffs here each year, nature conservation and tourism inevitably conflict. The documentary highlights the fragile balance between nature conservation and tourism—and the impact of this on animals, plants, and the local people. Rügen is home to some of Germany's last remaining untouched coastal and forest landscapes. This unique natural environment is increasingly under threat. Problems include overcrowded beaches, illegal trails, RV campsites at the edge of the forest, nighttime drone flights, and dogs running loose in protected areas.

The documentary follows rangers from the Southeast Rügen Biosphere Reserve in their daily struggle to enforce rules and protect habitats—often meeting resistance from visitors who confuse freedom with being allowed to do whatever they want.

"Wild Rügen - Tourism vs. Nature Conservation" features stunning nature footage. But it also explores the downside of successful tourism. The documentary asks: How much pressure can an island withstand? And how can we succeed in preserving Rügen's wild beauty, without shutting out those who want to experience it?

Nikola Tesla, born in 1856 in what is now Croatia, was one of the world's greatest inventors. He developed numerous innovations in the field of electrical engineering and was granted over 280 patents, many of them in the USA.

Nikola Tesla arrived in New York in 1884 with barely a cent to his name. He worked briefly for Thomas Alva Edison, the inventor of the light bulb. However, their collaboration soon ended in a dispute. In the years that followed, Tesla developed groundbreaking technologies and implemented alternating current systems for the Westinghouse company. These shaped modern electrification.

For decades, Tesla conducted research into high-frequency alternating currents and the vision of wireless power transmission - a concept that was far ahead of its time. He also recognized early on that solar energy would become one of the most important sources of energy in the future. However, his visionary inventions were not fully realized during his lifetime.

Tesla's life was marked by extremes: periods of abject poverty and professional setbacks alternated with an eccentric lifestyle that's been heavily mythologized. In 1943, he died alone and destitute in a New York hotel.

Approximately 58,000 people are currently incarcerated in German prisons. Over half of them reoffend after their release. These statistics raise doubts about the prison system. Is something fundamentally wrong with German prisons?

To understand what prison does to people, journalist Frank Seibert voluntarily goes to jail. For a few hours, a cell door closes behind him. Isolation and the sudden loss of control change everything, he says after his "release".

What good does imprisonment do? Lawyer and former prison governor Thomas Galli says: nothing! He would release 90 per cent of people behind bars on parole. Prison means social exclusion. But it is also expensive, costing the state some €200 per prisoner, per day. In total, this means the system costs taxpayers over €10 million - every single day. Thomas Galli would rather see that money invested in social work and therapy for offenders.

René Müller has been working as a prison officer for over 20 years and disagrees. Locking up criminals serves the purposes of general safety, deterrence and a sense of justice, he says.

Frank Seibert explores the question: Who is right? To find answers, he meets with criminal law expert Kristin Drenkhahn from the Free University of Berlin, who is investigating the effect of the social climate in prisons on rehabilitation. Former prisoner Thomas, who attempted to kill a woman, describes this atmosphere from a very personal perspective. Prison changes people - but not for the better, in most cases, he concludes.

Neuroscientist Simone Kühn from the Max Planck Institute in Berlin and psychiatrist Johannes Fuß from the University of Duisburg/Essen are investigating the behavior and associated brain changes of prisoners. This is the world's first research project to investigate whether life behind bars is so monotonous and lacking in stimulation that certain regions of the brain shrink or even become inactive. Does prison make people sick, rather than better fit for life after their sentence ends?

In Norway, the then Minister of Justice asked himself this question back in the late 1980s, when recidivism rates were alarmingly high. To answer it, he convened a group of experts. Lawyer Are Høidal was one of its members.

Frank Seibert meets Høidal in a prison near Stavanger. This prison operates according to what's known as the 'normality principle.' This means no one serves a sentence under stricter circumstances than necessary for the security in the community, and that all criminals are treated with respect and kindness. Prisoners who cooperate - and that is most of them - are allowed to move to a residential area after a short time. They live here in small communities, without prison bars.

01:15 DocFilm*When Night Falls in Toronto

"We're just like New York," they say of their city, and usually add: "Only nicer!" Toronto is a melting pot of diverse cultures. Most of its residents have immigrated, at some point.

The documentary features the Neon Riders of Toronto, decorating their bikes with colorful lights and heading out at night for a ride and a party. Then there's 28-year-old Jill, who opts to spend the night catching raccoons instead of losing herself on a club dancefloor. Or Quinn, who upholds the traditions of his Indigenous ancestors through painted constellations. And the guys from the Latino band '6ix Pal Mundo', who are creating a new soundtrack for the city.

These are just a few of the many stories and moments in a film about a city that welcomes everyone, is beautiful but never pretentious, and doesn't beg to be loved -- but is adored by its inhabitants. A place where entering the world's largest underground pedestrian tunnel system can feel like taking a journey through several different continents.

Canada's largest city lives up to its promise of being a thriving multicultural metropolis. Seven million people from over 230 nations live in the Greater Toronto Area. As most residents will tell you with pride, if you make the most of your opportunities, you can achieve anything here. One of the reasons why Toronto is arguably the fastest-growing city in North America. But that brings another set of problems: the number of homeless people has doubled within four years, to more than 15,000.

In early September 1941, the German Wehrmacht was advancing on all fronts in the Soviet Union. Kyiv had fallen, the Smolensk stronghold had been defeated and Leningrad was under siege. Hitler intended to launch a major offensive against Moscow before the winter.

Under the code name Operation Typhoon, the 'final battle' began - a desperate fight for the Soviet capital. The Vyazma-Bryansk double battle was aimed at crushing Red Army units around Moscow before conquering the city itself. Initially, the Wehrmacht managed to encircle and wear down the Soviet defenders. However, rain and mud then brought the German advance to a standstill. When frost set in after a good two weeks, troops were back on the move and the battle for Moscow could begin.

Thousands of civilians were drafted in to bolster defenses around the metropolis. Then Stalin ordered the evacuation of the city on 16 October. Panic and looting ensued. Three days later, a state of siege was declared and martial law was imposed. Despite major supply problems, a new German offensive was launched in mid-November, which ultimately failed.

By the spring of 1942, Soviet troops were able to regain large parts of territory lost to the Germans. The German defeat at Stalingrad in 1943 is also regarded as a decisive turning point in the conflict. Thereafter, the German front never recovered and entered a period of inexorable decline. Despite a desperate propaganda push, including a speech by Hitler's propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels calling for 'total war', the German people had started to lose faith and doubt their nation's victory prospects. Operation Barbarossa failed and ultimately led to Germany's unconditional surrender in May 1945.

Nila's Dream in the Garden of Eden

Leyla loves her daughter Nila more than anything. But there's a problem: according to Iranian law, Nila does not exist. Because she is an illegitimate child, she has no papers or rights. Mother and daughter must fight the absurd rules of a disingenuous regime.

But the resourceful duo refuse to give up. They hope to become part of Iranian society and save Nila from a life in hiding. "Nila's Dream in the Garden of Eden" accompanies Leyla in her struggle to achieve recognition of her daughter Nila's identity. Until then, she cannot obtain papers, go to school or receive medical care. The doors of Iranian society are closed to her.

Leyla and Nila desperately try to escape this cycle and free themselves from life in the shadows. They fight against bureaucratic hurdles and the opaque rules of an arbitrary state that is blind to the fate of a child. Despite everything, they manage to remain optimistic - they paint, sing, dance and fantasize about great journeys, a jet-set life of luxury and a miraculous twist of fate. They are a living example of how dreams and hopes can defy even the bleakest circumstances.

Film director Niloufar Taghizadeh knows Leyla from her school days. Years later, she learns of Leyla's story, and a fate shaped by an absurd loophole in Iranian law. Driven by the desire to change the lives of the two, as well as that of many other undocumented children in Iran, she embarks on a risky journey to make this film. For almost three years, she accompanies the pair and films, partly undercover, in Iranian government offices and behind closed doors with decision-makers in the system to tell a story that, officially at least, doesn't exist.

In the 1990s, many Romanians left their homeland in search of work. They left behind deserted villages: children were raised by their grandparents, the elderly lived alone, and communities fell apart.

Antoanela Andonescu — affectionately known to everyone as "Coca" — also left her homeland back then. She worked for decades in Italy as a geriatric nurse. "The harder I work, the sooner I can return," she kept telling herself. But months turned into years. Her sisters followed her, and home faded into a memory.

When Coca finally returns to her small hometown of Bicaz in eastern Romania, she brings her savings with her — and a new sense of responsibility. She establishes a nursing home for the elderly who were left behind during the great wave of emigration. Almost all the residents in her nursing home have children abroad: Former cement factory worker Vasile has lived here since his family moved to Western Europe.

During an outing with her residents to Lake Bicaz, Coca becomes pensive: "I don't know how my life would have turned out if I had stayed." Her own story is representative of an entire generation — torn between their roots and a new beginning.

While Coca has found her way back to her native land, her nieces' lives have long been rooted in Italy. In the Ostia region near Rome, where some 250,000 Romanians now live, a new home has emerged. Coca's niece Andra has put down roots there — and wonders how much Romania will still shape her young daughter, Gizelle. What remains of one's origins when life takes you to a new place? And what does home mean in a world where families are parted by continents?

This documentary tells a story of farewells, new beginnings, and the search for belonging—and of people who, despite all the upheavals, are redefining their sense of home.

01:00 DW News - News*01:03 DocFilm*The Logic of the Many - The Swarm Principle

Researchers are investigating how animals behave in swarms. Their findings are being applied to robotics, logistics and new models of participation - and are opening up new perspectives for business and democracy.

The "Imaging Hangar" at the Centre for the Advanced Study of Collective Behavior (CASAB) at the University of Konstanz is a 225-square-metre hall equipped with cameras, sensors and a 3D environment - one of the largest swarm research laboratories in the world. "Not all swarms are driven by the same motivation," explains Iain Couzin, Director of the Institute of Behavioral Biology and spokesperson for CASAB. One of his surprising findings: "Locusts flee out of fear of being eaten by their own kind."

The "Artificial Life Lab" in Graz offers deep insights into the life of the queen bee. As part of the EU research project "RoboRoyale", biologist Thomas Schmickl observes the inner circle of a bee colony at close quarters using a robot equipped with a camera and artificial intelligence. For decades, he's been using technology to decipher the logic of swarms. A mini-robot swarm demonstrates how young bees make faster and better decisions when working as a group.

Melanie Schranz is researching how the swarm principle could optimize a semiconductor factory in Carinthia at the "Lakeside Labs" in Klagenfurt. Products that behave like bees independently seek out the nearest available food source. In this case, that means an available machine for the next stage of production. If one machine breaks down, production continues without the need for intervention from a central command.

The logic of the many applies not only to technology, but also to society. At the "Complexity Science Hub" in Vienna, psychologist Mirta Galesic demonstrates that diversity, independence and openness are crucial to collective intelligence. She refers to this as collective adaptability. And even democracy can be improved. "Today, it's often a narrow majority that decides how resources are used - this leads to cronyism and discontent," warns physicist and sociologist Dirk Helbing. At ETH Zurich, he is researching new ways of participatory decision-making. "Participatory budgeting", for example, is already being trialed in many cities.

The documentary offers a fascinating glimpse behind the scenes of swarm research and highlights its potential for business and democracy.
