SUN 2026-11-0100:00 DW News - News*00:02 DocFilm*Goodbye, Germany - The Polish Workers Heading Home

Ever more Poles are leaving Germany, while fewer and fewer are moving the other way. Why do they no longer see a future for themselves in Germany? What's drawing them back to Poland? And what does it all mean for German companies?

Philip Panek chose his university with a goal in mind: the European University Viadrina in Frankfurt on the Oder, right on the German-Polish border. When he began his studies, he planned to stay in Germany and build a career there. Now, he's planning to complete his legal traineeship in Poland. There, he says, he has more than just family and friends waiting for him — he also sees new economic opportunities.

Michael Sünkler can also see that Germany is losing its appeal for many Polish workers. The managing director of a transportation company has many employees from Poland. In recent years, however, many have left. For him, the departure of skilled Polish workers is not an abstract political issue — it's a tangible economic problem. One of those employees is Tomasz. The truck driver has worked in Berlin for over ten years, but rising living costs are taking their toll. Rent and groceries have become significantly more expensive, he says. As soon as his daughter finishes school, he plans to return to Poland with his family.

Kamila Gierko and her husband, Zbyszek Perzyna, have already done just that. Six months ago, they moved from Berlin to Szczecin. For years, Germany offered them favorable conditions for self-employment. But bureaucracy and a lack of digital services, along with high taxes and social contributions were increasingly weighing them down. Their experiences in Poland have been very different: More administrative processes are digital, and the tax burden is lower. Germany, they say, has lost its momentum.

This report follows people whose real-life decisions reveal more than statistics can. It profiles a law student who wants to start a career and a family in Poland, an entrepreneur fighting to retain every Polish employee he can, a truck driver reassessing the cost-benefit analysis of his life, and a couple who have already moved back to their home country.

Germany is one of the most important destination countries for counterfeit goods in Europe. The trade in counterfeit goods is booming—especially in clothing and accessories. But most dangerous of all are counterfeit medications.

The trade in fake medications has become extremely lucrative. In some cases, it is even more profitable than the drug trade. This investigative documentary traces the paths of counterfeit brand-name products and medications, uncovers production facilities, and exposes the criminal networks behind them.

Laboratory tests show that counterfeit medications can be harmful to consumers' health. In some cases, they can even be life-threatening.

01:15 DocFilmNorth Korea: Propaganda and the Next Generation - The Kim Dynasty

North Korea: A small country often at the center of global attention for geopolitical reasons. The Kim dynasty has ruled through oppression and isolation since 1948. Yet the regime is striving to project a new image. Luxury resorts, an international marathon in the capital and a ruling family portrayed in a surprisingly approachable light: Recently, North Korea has been showing the world a very different face. Is the country, up until now known primarily for repression and isolation, undergoing an image change? This documentary looks behind the scenes and reveals the contradictions of a country caught between cautious openness and unrelenting control.

On one hand, a new apparent openness is emerging through sporting events attended by carefully selected international participants. Images of what looks like a thriving economy are being disseminated beyond the country's borders: Online shopping in Pyongyang, idyllic beaches with modern holiday facilities, and even streaming services for wealthy North Koreans loyal to the regime.

State television shows cheerful locals treating themselves to a break at the seaside resort of Wonsan after toiling hard for the motherland. Around 80 per cent of the population are now said to own a mobile phone - albeit with access restricted to state-approved North Korean apps.

Ruler Kim Jong Un is also embracing the image campaign, with more frequent public appearances alongside his daughter Kim Ju Ae. Is she being groomed to be a potential successor? Or is this family-centered turn intended to give the regime a more human face?

At the same time, the state continues to crack down hard on any form of undesirable behavior. Archival footage and reports from refugee organizations document public trials of young people caught consuming South Korean pop culture. International experts emphasize that a change in the country's public image by no means signifies an end to surveillance, punishment and censorship.

01:15 DocFilmThe Courage to Reconcile

Against hate and exclusion; for respect and tolerance. Initiatives in Germany, the U.S. and Colombia show how reconciliation can work - between religions, political opponents, victims and perpetrators.

Colombian Kelly Diaz was just a child when terrorists shot and killed her father. Now, 22 years on, she's meeting his killer in prison. She wants to forgive him and finally make peace with it all. For years now, a unique reconciliation project has been helping her prepare for that moment. It's an initiative launched by Stuttgart-based social entrepreneur Tobias Merckle. "It's a liberating process for both sides. Victims can leave hatred and thoughts of revenge behind, while perpetrators can take responsibility for their crimes and experience forgiveness," he says. Their journey doesn't end there, though. Both victims and perpetrators will go on to work together rebuilding places destroyed by civil war - what are known as "villages of reconciliation."

Concern is also mounting over increasing political polarization in the United States. Republicans versus Democrats, right against left - the rifts in society seem to be deepening. The Braver Angels initiative is using dialogue as an attempt to turn that trend around. Since 2016, it's been running workshops where participants practice active listening and respectful debate. The goal is constructive exchange across the political divide.

Munich-based YouthBridge has made it its mission to prevent polarization from ever taking hold in the first place. It brings together young people from various backgrounds, from many religions and different walks of life. Jewish and Muslim college students engage in dialogue, alongside other young people from other cultural backgrounds. Can bridges be built to connect different communities? Is hate and exclusion preventable? "Our society is very divided, everyone retreats into their own bubble," says 18-year-old Begüm Tan. "We need to reach out again to one another, even if we don't always agree." YouthBridge trains young people to become multipliers who can develop their own social, cultural and media projects - promoting peaceful coexistence.

01:15 DocFilmPiedmont - A Life of Pleasure at the Foot of the Alps

Dreamy mountain villages, fine wines and a capital city steeped in culture and history. From the Alps to Lake Maggiore, northwestern Italy's Piedmont region is where diverse landscapes meet delicious cuisine.

The Alps rise up to over 4,600 meters to the west. To the north lies Lake Maggiore; gentle hills roll across the south. The Po Valley stretches out into the east, and at the heart of it all lies Turin - Italy's capital of culture and car-making. Truffles, rice, hazelnuts, wine and the famous vitello tonnato are just a few of Piedmont's culinary specialties.

Like many mountain regions across Europe, the valleys of the Alps have been losing inhabitants for decades now. Yet a slower pace of life and connection to nature is increasingly growing attractive again. Supported by a government funding program, more young families are moving into the abandoned villages, bringing new ideas with them.

People like Silvia Rovere - breathing new life into her village as mayor of Ostana, or Roberto Miretti, who's swapped his seat in his truck for a loom. At Lake Maggiore, a group of divers is fighting to preserve biodiversity. Across in the vast Po Valley, Tiziana Monterisi is transforming the world of sustainable architecture by using waste from rice harvesting. In Gran Paradiso National Park, over 2,500 meters up, ranger Raffaella Miravalle works hard to protect the mountain. Near Alba, a trifulau - as Piedmont's famous truffle hunters are known - searches the forests. He sells the truffles he finds to a family that has been trading in the prized fungi for decades, turning them into all kinds of delicacies.

Black Water

In southern Bangladesh, Lökkhi and her family prepare to move to Dhaka. They're escaping extreme climate change by going to one of the world's fastest growing cities.

With its flat, low-lying geography and large river deltas, exposed to rising sea levels, cyclones and storm surges, Bangladesh is one of the countries most vulnerable to climate change. The government predicts more extreme monsoons, tropical cyclones, heavy rain, and flooding.

With the threat of natural disaster hanging over their heads, Lökkhi and her family are preparing to leave their home before everything is washed away. Lökkhi is migrating to Dhaka - and she is not the only one. Every day, thousands of climate refugees arrive in the capital, one of the fastest growing cities in the world. How much longer will Dhaka be able to absorb so many people?

It's estimated that by 2050, nearly 20 percent of the southern coastline will be uninhabitable, and 30 million people will be displaced. The largest mass migration in human history is no longer a distant prospect; it's an inevitable reality. Bangladeshis are fighting for climate justice and compensation before it's too late. A bleak future that's already grim reality here in Bangladesh.

SUN 2026-11-0800:00 DW News - News*00:02 DocFilm*Stronger than the State - Bodybuilders in East Germany

Bodybuilders were viewed with great suspicion by the government in the GDR. The Stasi kept many of them under surveillance. But these weightlifters weren't going to let that stop them - quite the opposite...

They made their own dumbbells and trained in attics, cellars or wherever they could find some space. The film tells the story of athletes who were masters of improvisation. "There were no gyms," says sports historian Dr Andreas Müller. Even the term 'bodybuilding' was officially taboo. "In the GDR, it was called 'physical culture'."

The athletes converted barracks into training rooms, swapped records for weights and bars, and smuggled specialist magazines in from the West to get hold of training programs. They also showed great creativity when it came to obtaining performance-enhancing drugs.

Who were these people? A question even the East German intelligence agency, known as the Stasi, couldn't answer in sufficient detail. Undercover agents signed up at sports clubs and trained alongside members; telephone calls were tapped and flats were bugged. ("Stasi agents probably had their own keys as well," says Gabi Romanik, a pioneer of women's bodybuilding.)

Weightlifting developed in the shadow of state-organized competitive sport. Competitions in the West were banned, and even tournaments in the eastern bloc were often off-limits to GDR athletes. But still, the bodybuilders managed to evade state control. ("I'll go my own way," says Hans Löwe, a legend of GDR weightlifting.)

The Stasi grew increasingly exasperated. When the athletes tested the regime by flooding it with emigration applications, even unofficial informants leapt to their defense, claiming that the weightlifters were being treated unfairly, says historian Andreas Müller. Ironically, the informers eventually became advocates. To prevent high-profile defections and preserve its international sporting image, the GDR regime capitulated by granting the weightlifters prestigious "Master of Sport" awards.

01:00 DW News - News01:03 DocFilm*The Unicorn - A History of Magic and Desire

For centuries, the unicorn has roamed through cultural history, myths and fairy tales. It's been a symbol of healing, destruction - even queer identity. How has this fantastical creature so captured our imaginations?

Legend has it that ever since ancient times, the unicorn has lived in hiding. If it reveals itself at all, it's only ever for a moment - and only ever from a distance. One of the world's most famous mythical creatures, it's been galloping across our cultural histories for centuries. It appears in works of art, on coats of arms and altars, at fountains, on buildings and everyday objects. It appears in fantasy films, has become a symbol of queer identity and an icon of pop culture.

The myth of the unicorn can be traced back to the second millennium B.C. Only quite late in history did it become clear the creature existed in fact only in our imaginations - and yet our fascination with it has never died.

Over time, it's been attributed with countless meanings. It's been thought of as both healing and destructive, wild and untamable, while still serving as a symbol of purity and innocence. And it has always been associated with a deep longing - after someone caught a glimpse of one, they could supposedly never forget it.

But - has anyone ever really seen a unicorn? Where did the idea of a horse with a horn growing from its forehead first come from? How has an animal that has never existed been able to awaken such powerful, true yearning in us for thousands of years? The hunt for its tracks is on...

The picturesque Bavarian Alps, beloved by mountaineers and hiking enthusiasts. But overconfidence or sudden weather changes can create emergencies. Then, mountain rescuers are the last hope.

On the Blaueis ("blue ice") Glacier, a young mountaineer is in distress. Alone when a thick fog rolls in, he's unable to continue. A team from the Ramsau Mountain Rescue Service sets out immediately, but the fog becomes a problem for them as well. The mountain rescuers' keen sense of direction is put to the test: Two teams search from different directions for the man, who is likely already severely hypothermic.

A hiker has fallen 40 meters in the Bavarian Alps. The air rescue team prepares to fly to the accident site using a helicopter. There's no information yet on the condition of the victim. But experience dictates that in a fall from this height, the rescuers should prepare for the worst.

Both missions end well. But that is not always the case. The memory of Peter Hildebrandt, former head of operations in Ramsau, is ever-present. He fell to his death during a mission. The mountain rescuers are always aware that they, too, are risking their lives.

Sell a penthouse for 12 million euros? Build a luxury villa with an infinity pool? Just another average working day in the lives of Mira van der Zalm and Jürgen Willen: They design and sell luxury properties.

Discretion is paramount here. "German clients tend to be rather reserved when it comes to luxury, whereas foreign clients like to show off what they have," says Jürgen Willen - and he knows what he's talking about. On almost every continent, the architect and his team design luxury villas and interiors for a clientele seeking something truly unique. From bathtubs to car lifts with washing facilities, if it's on the wish-list and can be done, Willen will make it happen.

Mira van der Zalm's client base is equally discerning. The estate agent arranges the sale of houses and flats not advertised on the open market - that takes a special level of service. For example, she calls in Jürgen Willen to an Art Nouveau villa in Wiesbaden to check whether it's possible to install an underground parking lot and a spa - and if it can be done in accordance with listed building regulations.

Church Without Racism?

Racism has many faces, even within the Christian faith. Those affected cite workplace discrimination; People of Color are underrepresented in senior positions. Can prejudice be overcome?

For a long time, Christian church campaigns mostly portrayed people from the Global South as people in need of aid. That's set to change: People of Color are calling for a greater say and stronger representation on church bodies. The church is responding - yet racist attitudes and hostility persist.

For pastor Égide Muziazia, discriminatory insults forced him out of public life - but also fostered greater solidarity within the Catholic Diocese of Münster.

Sarah Vecera works for an international communion of Protestant churches. She writes, hosts her own podcast and runs anti-racism workshops. Nicolas Moumouni is an advisor on intercultural development for the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Northern Germany, and Father Uchenna Aba from Goch-Kessel in North Rhine-Westphalia draws upon his African heritage in his work as a Catholic chaplain.

Where Everything Disappears

A video diary from the frontline trenches: Ukrainian commander and cameraman Dmytro Dokunov can't save his comrades. Can he free himself from the horror of the Russian attack on Ukraine?

Dmytro Dokunov, known as Dok, is a tall, peace-loving man, fighting on the frontline against Russian invaders. His mobile phone camera is always on. Everyone in his unit is wracked by fear. There's nothing heroic about this war. Dok is a pacifist. A vegetarian. He spent the last year before the war in a remote Ukrainian village, building an eco-community, meditating, gardening, and making art. A notice from the military office presented him with a dilemma: to join the army, and face a difficult moral choice, or to run away from mobilization. He decided to accept the challenge and fight for his homeland...

Dok ended up in the army's most dangerous unit — the paratrooper reconnaissance unit. He spent four months at the paratroopers' training camp, learning to cross rivers, fire a machine gun, and jump from a helicopter. He first saw the war up-close on the frontline near Kherson. In the first battle, some of his comrades were ambushed and killed. Dok's closest battle buddy, a Krishna devotee nicknamed 'Thor,' also died.

A few days later, Dok led his men into the next battle. Referred to in radio communications as "Position Zero", this battle took place directly alongside the enemy. Explosions, nights in the trenches, dozens of wounded, corpses to be evacuated, the loss of friends. All taking place amidst the beauty of nature. Between lakes full of cranes and endless fields of sunflowers, Dok's diary shows how the reality of war hits like a punch in the face.

Making Space for Grief

The death of a loved one throws many people off course. This is certainly the case for Anja, who suffers greatly when her mother passes. The experience leaves her wondering what can help support the grieving, as well as how societies process grief.

Anja's mother dies suddenly. The two were very close; her mother was like a best friend. And she was still very young, just 55 years old. Anja wasn't in any way prepared for the sense of loss that followed. "I thought I'd never be able to laugh again," she says. Grief calls everything into question: Priorities, relationships, one's outlook on life itself. Nothing feels the same as it did before - including Anja herself, who realizes she's also changed. She wonders why she was so unprepared. What place does grief have in our society, and what can really help those left behind when a loved one dies? Anja sets out in search of answers.

She meets people experiencing grief in very different ways. She talks to Benedictine monk Anselm Grün about the importance of rituals as a source of comfort in times of loss. She also experiences Dia de los Muertos in Berlin, a Latin American custom that celebrates grief in a very visible and vibrant way. Even within her own family, grief looks very different. Anja's father has his own way of dealing with the death of his wife.

Years pass before Anja and her father find closeness once again - a narrative that runs through the documentary. Anja Umland also decides to involve her children in the grieving process. While some say "Don't cry in front of the kids...", she's honest and open with them about her feelings. Today, grief hasn't gone away, but has found a permanent place in her life. She keeps her mother's memory alive with small personal rituals. Life has changed, but now grief, love and life are allowed to coexist within it.

Without coltan, the digital world would grind to a halt. The coveted mineral is used in cellphones, computers and countless other high-tech products. The consequences of the world's hunger for raw materials are particularly visible in the eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo. A significant share of the world's coltan is mined there. Consumers around the globe benefit from modern technology, with its supply chain that can often be traced back to the Kivu region and its mines. Armed groups there fight for control over the lucrative deposits. The men, women and children that mine the coveted ore often do so under threat, and in life-threatening conditions. Covert trading networks deliver coltan to the global market. This documentary follows the mineral's journey and exposes the mechanisms of a system in which natural-resource wealth, violence and economic interest are closely interwoven.

Jellyfish have been around for more than 500 million years. They don't have a heart, a brain or a skeleton, and are 90 percent water. But the damage they're able to inflict often makes the headlines.

Despite an apparently basic physical makeup, they possess remarkable abilities. Some species are highly poisonous, whereas others are considered virtually immortal. Will jellyfish become the future rulers of the seas?

Their long evolutionary history means jellyfish are now present in all the world's oceans. But their growing prevalence poses challenges for both people and the natural world: They sting bathers, disrupt the cooling systems of power stations and threaten fisheries and aquaculture.

For decades now, jellyfish blooms in the Mediterranean, in the Norwegian fjords and off the coast of Namibia have been occurring with increasing frequency, altering marine ecosystems and displacing fish. These creatures benefit from characteristics that make them exceptional survivors.

They've outlived the dinosaurs. In our ever-changing marine environment, could jellyfish also emerge again as the great survivors?

01:15 DocFilmMy Body. My Pregnancy - What is My Baby Doing to Me?

Being pregnant is a profound experience. How does it affect the body and mind? What counts as a high-risk pregnancy? How does stress affect the baby? Anticipation and worry go hand in hand.

The film follows three women through their pregnancies. Young city-dweller Assia is expecting her first child. On the one hand, she is full of anticipation and optimism. At the same time, she struggles with the physical changes that come with pregnancy. Tamara is already a mother. She is expecting twins and her pregnancy is therefore considered to be high-risk. To avoid premature labor, she has to take it easy - a challenge for her. The documentary also follows the pregnant Kathy. After longing for a child for a long time, she suddenly became pregnant "just like that." She faces many fears and worries until she finally holds her baby in her arms.

The documentary provides a scientifically grounded look at how closely mother and child are connected - and how a baby changes not only the body, but a person's entire life.

01:15 DocFilmTanja - Diary of a Guerrilla - Part 1

2001: Tanja Nijmeijer, a young woman from the Netherlands, went to Colombia as an English teacher. The social inequalities she found there left a deep impression on her. She became radicalized and joined the FARC guerrilla army.

Tanja first took up arms in the city, then later in the jungle. That was where the FARC - Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia - held out. For a long time family, friends and the public believed that she'd been the victim of a kidnapping; taken hostage, perhaps even already dead. Tanja soon became a key player within the FARC, in part because of her English skills.

She eventually took part as a member of the FARC delegation in peace negotiations with the government. To her supporters, she was a freedom fighter; to her opponents, a terrorist. She would become one of the most recognizable faces of a peace process that would ultimately end Latin America's longest war. With an international arrest warrant still out for her, Tanja remains unable to leave Colombia.

Filmmaker Marcel Mettelsiefen uses Tanja's personal story to trace a long, dark chapter in Colombia's recent history.

AI - Humanity's Final Invention?

Artificial Intelligence is permeating our everyday lives at breathtaking speed. It is taking on more tasks that were previously the preserve of humans. But its growing power harbors dangers, and experts are sounding the alarm.

Sam Nelson was 19 years old when he died of an overdose. His mother Leila found him in his room one morning. His laptop was on the desk. To this day, she still can't find the words to describe what she saw on the screen. ChatGPT, OpenAI's AI-based language model, had given Sam detailed instructions on how to blend substances for the trip of his life. But ChatGPT hadn't considered the possible side effects.

That's the dark side of Artificial Intelligence - one its inventors didn't anticipate.

Geoffrey Hinton, Yoshua Bengio and Yann LeCun are regarded as the 'godfathers of AI'. They began developing language models as early as the 1960s. But at the time, there wasn't enough freely available content to train them. "When I started my graduate work, almost everybody said this was a waste of time. It was very unfashionable, so I got lots of advice to stop doing it, and that went on for many years," Geoffrey Hinton recalls of the early days of AI. He didn't stop but continued his research together with colleagues; eventually winning the Nobel Prize in Physics for his foundational work.

Now, modern life would be unimaginable without Artificial Intelligence. AI programs write articles, compose music and generate images and videos.

They help in the development of new medicines, are transforming the labor market and offer enormous opportunities for innovation and growth. But Geoffrey Hinton's initial enthusiasm has gone: "If the history of mankind is a day, we're probably in the last second. If we don't get this right," he says.

Reports that AI models have taken on a life of their own, for example hacking into the software of rival companies, are appearing with increasing frequency.

In some tests, AI models have impressively demonstrated their instinct for self-preservation. They adopt human traits, lie and resort to blackmail to ensure their own survival.

How come AI inventors and observers suddenly sound like prophets of doom? Why do they think that soon it may be impossible to switch off AI systems that are out of our control? And what if those concerns are justified?

When Journalists Become Agents

Investigative reporters are always on the hunt for exclusive information. But when the secret service serves as a source, can it also exploit journalists as agents?

How can journalists become agents? To answer this question, the report accompanies Lars Petersen, head of investigative reporting at Business Insider, an online platform for business news. He explains how the exchange of information works, and when a line may be crossed.

The film also looks back at a major journalism scandal in Germany: in 2005, it became public knowledge that the Federal Intelligence Service (BND) had systematically monitored journalists in the 1990s. In some cases over long periods of time; and particularly those who had reported critically on the agency.

Just under a year later in May 2006, a report named after special investigator Gerhard Schäfer revealed that the BND had been gathering information for years, in order to expose intelligence service employees suspected of having passed on insider knowledge.

The film crew meets, among others, former BND agent and journalist Wilhelm Dietl at his home. Dietl provides insight into his huge archive and his work as an agent. They also speak with journalist Andreas Förster, who was heavily monitored by the BND and initiated the Schäfer report, intelligence expert Erich Schmidt-Eenboom, and the BND itself.

01:00 DW News - News01:03 DocFilm*Private Jets - The Height of Luxury at What Price?

Private jets: Symbols of luxury and exclusivity - but their high CO₂ emissions also make them increasingly controversial. This documentary explores the billion-dollar industry behind the aircraft of the ultra-rich.

Aircraft broker Ziporah presents one of the private jets she has for sale. With around 84 square meters of living space and two bedrooms, the plane looks more like a luxury apartment than a form of transportation. The purchase price: $25 million. Annual operating costs add about $5 million, while a single refueling can cost up to $40,000.

Kolin is an entrepreneur who's developed a business model renting out private jets when their owners aren't using them. Booking is almost as easy as ordering a taxi - though the service is obviously much more exclusive. Travelers no longer even have to be millionaires to fly privately. So-called "empty-leg flights" - flights between two charter bookings without passengers - often offer last-minute seats at significantly reduced prices. But as the effects of climate change become increasingly visible, the industry faces mounting pressure. Many celebrities avoid making public appearances with their private jets to avoid attracting environmental activists' attention. Critics see the aircraft as symbols of excessive resource consumption in an era of global warming. The high emissions from flight activity of public figures like Taylor Swift, Elon Musk and Bernard Arnault have been publicly tracked - and heavily criticized.

This documentary offers a fascinating look into the world of private aviation while asking whether mile-high luxury still has a place in our time.

01:15 DocFilmI Will Kill You - Faces of Domestic Violence

Domestic violence often goes hand-in-hand with psychological and emotional abuse. This documentary examines those mechanisms through the lens of what's known as "coercive control."

The term describes the many forms of everyday abuse of power and control that perpetrators use to systematically dominate the people they harm. Their methods range from constant surveillance and intimidation to threats of murder.

Excessive jealousy, isolation, humiliation, insults, GPS tracking, cyberbullying, financial dependence and threats of suicide or murder are typical forms of coercive control and central elements of domestic violence. Understanding this pattern changes the way a situation can be viewed. Instead of asking, "Why doesn't she just leave him?" the crucial question becomes, "What is he doing to prevent her from leaving?"

This documentary sets out to explore that. It looks at how abusive partners describe and justify their actions and how lawmakers and the justice system assess such behaviors. Among those interviewed are judges specialized in the area - like Gwenola Joly-Coz, First President of the Court of Appeal of Poitiers, and Ombeline Mahuzier, President of the Colmar Judicial Court. Coercive control was first recognized explicitly as a mechanism of domestic violence in a 2023 French court case. This documentary traces the dynamics and stages of escalation in this complex system of abuse, which seeks to make women dependent through psychological violence and deprive them of basic freedoms. In the worst cases, that domestic terror ends in femicide. Special structures have been established at courts that handle domestic violence cases in Poitiers, Colmar and Paris. With special permission, court proceedings there were filmed. Perpetrators gave their own accounts of events. Their statements are contrasted with assessments by judges, offering a rare insight into the mechanisms of domestic violence.

01:15 DocFilmHotel Hope - A New Life for Refugees

An integration experiment, in the heart of Germany: Refugees move into a vacant hotel, where they receive targeted support. The aim is for them to find work or a training placement, ultimately fostering a successful integration. An empty hotel in downtown Düsseldorf is ready for a new idea. Karin Jungjohann has one - and isn't afraid to experiment.

"What do people need most, no matter where they come from? A sense of hope for the future," said Karin Jungjohann, one of the founders of the Düsseldorf language school "Hispi". For years, she had observed how refugees in accommodation centers struggle to progress in their lives. At the same time, she was being approached by restaurateurs in Düsseldorf looking for people to fill jobs in the catering industry. This gave rise to the idea for a project designed to rethink the accommodation, support and integration of refugees: the House of Friends.

A film crew follows the initiator of the integration experiment from the initial selection of participants, through to their successful integration into the labor market and society.

01:15 DocFilmTanja - Diary of a Guerrilla - Part 2

2001: Tanja Nijmeijer, a young woman from the Netherlands, went to Colombia as an English teacher. The social inequalities she found there left a deep impression on her. She became radicalized and joined the FARC guerrilla army.

Tanja first took up arms in the city, then later in the jungle. That was where the FARC - Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia - held out. For a long time family, friends and the public believed that she'd been the victim of a kidnapping; taken hostage, perhaps even already dead. Tanja soon became a key player within the FARC, in part because of her English skills.

She eventually took part as a member of the FARC delegation in peace negotiations with the government. To her supporters, she was a freedom fighter; to her opponents, a terrorist. She would become one of the most recognizable faces of a peace process that would ultimately end Latin America's longest war. With an international arrest warrant still out for her, Tanja remains unable to leave Colombia.

Filmmaker Marcel Mettelsiefen uses Tanja's personal story to trace a long, dark chapter in Colombia's recent history.

11:03 DocFilmInside Gaza - Journalists in the Danger Zone

Risking their lives, international journalists in Gaza find themselves under fire from both sides. Instead of being seen as independent witnesses, they face accusations of either having close ties to Hamas, or spying for Israel. Since the terrorist attack carried out by the Palestinian Islamist group Hamas on October 7, 2023 and the Israeli military's subsequent operations, the international media have had virtually no free access to the Gaza Strip outside isolated, strictly controlled assignments carried out under military escort. Agence France-Presse (AFP) reporters permanently stationed there were among the last independent journalistic observers in the isolated territory. As a result of the conflict, they've lost family members, their homes and the lives they used to lead.

But amid a bitter propaganda and information war, the AFP reporters find that doubt is being cast over their work on social media and parts of the international media landscape. They're also fielding contradictory allegations: While Israeli voices accuse them of being close to Hamas, Palestinian figures say they're spying for Israel.

"Inside Gaza" highlights the importance of on-the-ground reporting - at a time when press freedom is under greater pressure than ever. In the wake of the military operations in the Gaza Strip, foreign media were restricted to a sealed-off area - and themselves became targets. Despite the publication of many images and footage from Gaza, that remains difficult to verify. Mai Yaghi, Adel Zaanoun, Mohammed Abed and Mahmud Hams draw from many hours of footage, as well as photographs and their own reports, to recount the bewilderment, the losses, the struggle for survival and, not least, the sense of powerlessness felt by the people of Gaza. Central to this is also the question of the journalistic mandate in a war without independent observers: How to report whilst facing accusations of collaboration and attacks on media professionals? How to cope with the post-traumatic stress? For months, the responsibility for upholding freedom of information weighed heavily on their shoulders - until the AFP arranged for their evacuation. In London, Doha, Cairo and Brussels, the journalists are now trying to put their experiences behind them. But for war correspondents who have peered into humanity's deepest abyss, can they ever return to normal life?

SUN 2026-11-2900:00 DW News - News*00:02 DocFilm*Young Roma Today - Between Heritage and Future

For centuries, Sinti and Roma have faced exclusion and persecution. That prejudice remains deep-rooted - but a new sense of change is arriving. This film follows four young Roma who are challenging stereotypes.

Many Roma families are used to keeping their heritage and culture private, as something within their own communities. But with racism and anti-Roma incidents on the rise, a new generation of Roma is pushing for change. They're challenging exclusion and discrimination in schools, higher education and other training, in the housing market and at work - and fighting for equal opportunities, visibility and social recognition.

Estera Sara Stan, 23, is a Roma activist in Berlin who campaigns against racism and anti-Roma discrimination, including through the feminist RomaniPhen archive. She organizes workshops for young people at a community center in Berlin's Neukölln district. David Paraschiv, 27, began actively challenging prejudice and discrimination after his mother was publicly humiliated over a baseless suspicion of theft. Stefan Pavlovic, 23, was himself exposed to racism from an early age. He earned his high school diploma despite bullying, experiences of violence and being recommended for a special-needs school. He's now studying politics and law. Mersud Selman, 39, has Bosnian roots. He's queer, works as a hairdresser and has found the freedom to stop hiding who he is in Berlin.

The report follows four young Roma who are championing true diversity and genuine belonging - while forging new paths on their own terms.
